With this model, Tubbs focuses on the five most important components of human communication including "input", "filter", "channel", "noise" and "time". "Input", as Tubbs (1983) stated in his work, is "all the stimuli, both past and present, which gives us our information about the world" (Tubbs & Moss 1983, pp.27). In other words, it means that the physical and social background of communicators contribute to their understanding of the communication itself.
